Attention to detail and diversity drives McClure Law Group

Plenty has changed in the family law field over the past decade, something McClure Law Group founder Kelly McClure knows well. One thing that hasn't changed, however, is the level of preparation put in by the prestigious, highly-decorated Dallas firm in advance of each case.

"I do think the preparation and the commitment level of our firm is exceptional and that clients can tell the difference between a firm that prepares and one that does not," said McClure, who's also the firm's managing partner and CEO. "Our attorneys get many referrals from people we've helped as a result. In fact, I think the biggest compliment is when someone's been through a horrible ordeal and then they refer you based on the job you did to help them."

"Believe it or not, many times we get referrals from the other side, too. That's always a huge compliment when the ex-spouse refers somebody to you."

McClure Law Group also distinguishes itself for the diversity of its team of attorneys. This gives clients from all walks of life and all backgrounds someone they can feel comfortable with to represent them.

"Different people complement the firm in different ways and every single one of us has our strengths. In this regard, we're far and beyond our competitors," said Francesca Blackard, partner. "We're diverse in all ways, by language, ethnicity, religion, age. We've set the bar and it's something we're very proud of."

"We are definitely the first family law firm in Dallas to be so diverse and it's another reason why we're the premium service in Dallas."

McClure, Blackard and fellow partner Robert Epstein form the nucleus of expertise at the firm, which has seen an uptick in business lately across all age groups.

"We're seeing a trend to 'gray divorces' where people who are older are getting divorced," Blackard said. "We're also seeing people in their younger years getting divorced. In the past, we hadn't seen so many long-term marriages ending in divorce, but now we're seeing those on the rise, too."

Each case brings its own special consideration, which McClure Law Group is more than equipped to handle, McClure said.

"Money issues are a lot different in each of these cases," she said. "Younger clients will recoup money over the span of their lifetime, whereas for the older clients, there may be a limited opportunity to recoup that income. The same thing goes for businesses; we have clients who have had businesses together and when you have an older couple in divorce and they have an asset that they've worked on for 20 years, that gets a bit more challenging. Taxes become considerably more complicated, depending on the situation."

"No matter what the client's age, dollars are always important to everybody. You want to be sure your attorney is well-versed and experienced to handle whatever your situation calls for. That's where an experienced firm like ours is invaluable."
